Introduction

This guide to the archives of former Prime Minister Malcolm Fraser has been jointly produced by the National Archives of Australia and the University of Melbourne Archives (UMA). It will assist researchers in finding records relating to both Malcolm and Tamie Fraser in the National Archives, UMA and other collections.

It is the sixth volume to be published in the National Archives’ Guides to Archives of Australia’s Prime Ministers series and is a companion publication to the Australia’s Prime Ministers website (primeministers.naa.gov.au).

Malcolm Fraser

Malcolm Fraser was Australia’s twenty-second Prime Minister, serving from 1975 until 1983. He began his term as caretaker Prime Minister on 11 November 1975, after Governor-General Sir John Kerr dismissed Gough Whitlam’s Labor government.

The Fraser Coalition government was returned with the largest landslide of any federal election a month later, and remained in office until 1983. Despite this electoral success, the constitutional crisis of 1975 left a legacy of controversy that marred Fraser’s prime ministership.

Fraser had an important influence on the changing relations of countries within the Commonwealth of Nations, and on shaping Australia’s relations with the countries of East and South-East Asia. Although economic rationalism was introduced in policy debate during Fraser’s term of office, his government reflected more traditional principles in financial management and fiscal policy.

Before becoming Prime Minister, Fraser had spent 10 years as a backbencher in the government of Robert Menzies. He then became Minister for the Army in 1966, under Harold Holt, and was also a minister in the governments of John Gorton and William McMahon.

Tamie Fraser

Tamara (Tamie) Fraser grew up in western Victoria, where her family had a grazing property. The couple married in 1956, and by the time Fraser became Prime Minister in 1975, they had four children aged between nine and 17 years.

Tamie Fraser undertook a number of political roles during her husband’s prime ministership. When Malcolm was ill during the crucial election campaign in December 1975 after the dismissal of the Whitlam government, she deputised for him.

Although Tamie claimed she hated electioneering work, she was good at it and was regarded by Liberal Party campaign managers as an asset. Commenting on her role to an Age newspaper reporter on 5 December 1975, she said: ‘The hardest thing to take is that you are public property’. She nevertheless played a prominent role in the 1975, 1977, 1980 and 1983 federal election campaigns.
National Archives of Australia

The National Archives preserves and cares for a diverse archival collection documenting the relationship between the Australian Government and the Australian population – a rich resource for the study of Australian history, society and people.

The collection spans almost 200 years of Australian history. Its main focus is material documenting federal government activities since Federation in 1901. However, the National Archives has significant holdings of nineteenth-century records relating to functions transferred by the colonies to the federal government at the time of Federation.

The National Archives also has a rich collection of records created by Australia's prime ministers, ministers, leaders of the Opposition and shadow ministers. Further information about these is available on the National Archives’ website and RecordSearch collection database (naa.gov.au).

In addition, the Australia’s Prime Ministers website, managed by the National Archives, has a wealth of information about Australia's prime ministers and their spouses (primeministers.naa.gov.au).

University of Melbourne Archives

The UMA was established in 1960 to collect and preserve the records of the University of Melbourne, as well as the records of Victorian businesses for the purpose of historical research. In the early 1970s, the UMA broadened its collecting scope to include the archives of trade union and other labour-related bodies, professional associations, and community, women’s, peace and political organisations. Complementing these organisational collections are the personal papers of individuals prominent within these organisations and fields.

The UMA now holds more than 18 kilometres of records, dating as far back as the 1790s and reflecting a broad range of endeavour within the state. The collections are generally available for research by academics and the public. The UMA website allows researchers to search all of the collections, and view finding aids and digital images of collection items (lib.unimelb.edu.au/collections/archives).

The UMA is also recognised for its Malcolm Fraser Collection, which amounts to around 120 metres of personal and political records. The Malcolm Fraser Collection website contains photographs, speeches, articles, digitised documents, timelines and other information relating to Fraser and the UMA collection (unimelb.edu.au/malcolmfraser).

Records in two locations

In 2004, Fraser designated the University of Melbourne as the official custodian of his personal papers. Records that are designated as Commonwealth under the Archives Act 1983 remain at the National Archives. The two collections are thus complementary – with the National Archives collection focused on Fraser’s ministerial and prime ministerial functions, and the UMA collection on his pre and post-parliamentary career and his time in opposition – although there is integration between the two.

Structure of this guide

This guide is divided into two major parts, the first relating to Malcolm Fraser and the second to Tamie Fraser. Each contains a short biography written by journalist Margaret Simons, and is followed by descriptions of relevant archival records prepared by the authors – Elizabeth Masters and Katie Wood – and other contributors.

First listed are records in the National Archives collection, then those in the UMA collection and finally those in other institutions, including the National Library of Australia, museums, state archives, university archives and other collecting organisations.
The archival records of Fraser include official Commonwealth government records, correspondence and private papers. Records about him include photographs, memorabilia, oral histories, films and other audiovisual material.

This guide does not include listings of all extant archival records on Malcolm and Tamie Fraser. The National Archives collection alone contains more than 370 shelf kilometres of records, and therefore only a proportion of those likely to be of interest to readers have been identified and included. The guide is intended to direct researchers towards the types of series and documents where they might find relevant items.

Record descriptions

Each entry in the National Archives section of this guide describes a group of records maintained together as a series. A series consists of items, which are often individual files (or sometimes volumes, sets of cards or photographs, for example), received into custody by the National Archives from a creating government agency or person. Series usually consist of many items, but occasionally they may consist of just a few or even a single item.

The description for each series gives its content and function. The entry may conclude with a select list of items from the series. In some instances, particular series have been found to contain relevant material on multiple aspects of Fraser’s career and have been referred to more than once.

Entries in the UMA section of this guide cite the UMA reference number, the item and box number where relevant, and a description of the item.

Sample descriptions of National Archives and UMA records appear on pages 4 and 5.

Key

1. This line gives the series title and date range of the records that make up the series. The series number is shown on the right-hand side. A series is the organisational arrangement used by the National Archives to control and manage records. It may contain one or more items. Some series may contain hundreds or thousands of items.

2. This entry shows the agency or person that created the series, and the date range when the series was created or recorded. The CA (Commonwealth Agency) and CP (Commonwealth Person) numbers are unique identifiers allocated by the National Archives to each agency or person. This number can be used to retrieve more information about the agency or person and the records they created from the National Archives’ RecordSearch collection database.

3. This line shows the total volume of records in the series. In some cases only a few items within a series will relate to the topic, but in other instances the entire series will be devoted to it. The location of the National Archives’ office where the series is held is also shown.

4. This paragraph gives a brief description of the record series.

5. This entry shows the title given to an item within the series. The title is usually applied by the person or agency creating the record. The date of the item contents is included at the end of the title. The item’s series number and identifying number appear on the right-hand side. These numbers must be quoted when requesting a copy of, or access to, a record.

6. Where included, this paragraph provides further information on the item.

Key

1 This information gives the collection title and reference number (on the right-hand side) for the particular set of records. The UMA Malcolm Fraser Collection includes private papers that were originally organised by, and held at, the National Archives. Where this is the case, the UMA has retained the order of the documents originally imposed by the National Archives, but has given each former series a distinct reference number. Material that was received from Fraser has been ordered according to the UMA's standards. The size of the sets of records varies from one item to thousands.

2 This line shows the total volume of records in the set. In some cases only a few items within a set will relate to the topic, but in other instances the entire set will be devoted to it.

3 This paragraph gives a brief overview of the record set.

4 This line shows the title and date range of an item within a set. On the right is the item number and the box number, if relevant. The item numbering is not uniform among different sets of records. The UMA has sought to retain the original number of the item where the material was transferred from the National Archives or Fraser's office. When identifying material, the specific format of each item number should be observed.

5 Where included, this paragraph provides further information on the item.

Accessing records

National Archives of Australia

Access to records in the National Archives is open to all, subject to provisions of the Archives Act.

The National Archives records described in this guide are listed in the RecordSearch collection database. It is accessible online (naa.gov.au) and in all National Archives reading rooms in capital cities. Indexes and inventories of records, providing item lists for some series, are also available in National Archives reading rooms.

To view original records listed in this guide, a researcher will need to visit the National Archives reading room in the location where the records are held. However, much research can be undertaken online by using RecordSearch, where many digitised records can be viewed and requests to view other records can be submitted.
Access to archival records is governed by the Archives Act, which gives a right of access to most Commonwealth government records once they reach the open period. The open period was reduced from 30 to 20 years following amendments to the Act in 2010. This change to the open period took effect in January 2011 and is being phased in over 10 years.

Records in the open period are available for public access unless they contain information that falls into certain exemption categories defined in section 33 of the Archives Act. Before the National Archives releases records for public access, they are examined to ensure they do not contain exempt information. Most records (98 per cent) are wholly released for public access, while 1.75 per cent are released with some exempt information deleted. The information withheld from public access falls into two broad areas: sensitive personal information, and information about the security of the Commonwealth and its residents.

Most access examination is completed within a month but it may take up to 90 days to examine some files as consultation with other government agencies is often required. The National Archives will inform researchers if delays are expected.

More information on accessing records is available in Fact sheet 10 – Access to records under the Archives Act, and Fact sheet 11 – Viewing records in the reading room, available at naa.gov.au.

University of Melbourne Archives

Access to the records and reference service at the UMA is available to all researchers, not just university students and staff. Some material is restricted and the condition under which it is restricted varies. Some may be viewed once the researcher has sought permission, others are under embargo for a specified period of time. To inquire about access to restricted collections, contact the UMA reference service.

Most of the Malcolm Fraser Collection at the UMA is listed on the online database. For specific requests, it is necessary to include the reference number as well as the item and box number.

Other institutions

Inquiries about gaining access to records held by institutions other than the National Archives and the UMA should be directed to the institution concerned.
Citing the records

The correct citation of archival records is important, both when requesting the records and when referring to them in published works. Using proper citations will help staff locate records more readily and will assist other researchers to find the material.

The correct form of citation for records held by the National Archives is: ‘National Archives of Australia’ followed by a colon and a space, the series number followed by a comma and a space, and then the item control symbol. An example is: National Archives of Australia: A2443, 3.

‘National Archives of Australia’ may be abbreviated to ‘NAA’, provided the full name has been used in the first citation. Further details about correctly citing records from the National Archives collection are available in Fact sheet 7 – Citing archival records, available at naa.gov.au.

The correct form of citation for records held by the UMA is: ‘University of Melbourne Archives’, followed by the collection name, accession number, item and box number, and a description of the item. For example: University of Melbourne Archives, Malcolm Fraser Collection, 2006.0017, item 25 part 1, box 4, letter from Ian Smith to Don Jessop, 20 November 1974. ‘University of Melbourne Archives’ may be abbreviated to ‘UMA’.

Correct citations for other institutions should be checked with the relevant institution.
1 Malcolm Fraser

This short biographical essay was written by journalist Dr Margaret Simons who co-authored, with Malcolm Fraser, Malcolm Fraser: the political memoirs published by The Miegunyah Press in 2010.

Malcolm Fraser has been one of the most controversial and possibly most misunderstood of Australia's prime ministers. He was commissioned as caretaker Prime Minister on 11 November 1975 following the supply crisis and the dismissal of the Whitlam government. This was one of the most turbulent and divisive periods in Australian political history. Yet Fraser was elected weeks later, on 13 December, with a record majority and a 29-seat turnaround against the Australian Labor Party in the House of Representatives and a majority in the Senate.

Because of the way in which he came to power, and the causes he had until then championed, Fraser was seen at the time as a firm right-winger and Gough Whitlam's opposite. With the perspective of history, it is clear that in many ways Whitlam and Fraser were similar. Continuity between their governments included concern for the rights of Indigenous Australians, including land rights, the pursuit of open government and human rights. On foreign policy, Fraser was a Cold War warrior and strong defender of the US alliance; yet like Whitlam he advocated an independent Australian foreign policy, and he made clear that the Whitlam initiatives bringing Australia closer to China and the Asian region were bipartisan. Fraser was one of our most active prime ministers on the world stage, making Australia a leader in the battle to end apartheid in South Africa – an agenda he continued to champion in his life after politics. It was also the Fraser government that brought the end of the White Australia Policy into practical effect.

Whitlam and Fraser differed most sharply on economic management, with Fraser advocating restraint and cuts after the big spending period of Whitlam. Even here, though, Fraser was not by today’s standards an advocate of small government. He believed in a strong role for an interventionist government. Nor was he an economic conservative, as some have claimed. A reading of the archival record makes clear that he and his staff can take much of the credit for the groundwork of the financial deregulation pursued by the Hawke–Keating governments in the 1980s and 1990s.

Fraser the Prime Minister is perhaps best seen as a transitional figure between the Australian settlement1 and the modern era. Another key to understanding his role in public life is as an activist – prepared to force a crisis when he believed it necessary, and rarely concluding that the right thing to do was nothing. The supply crisis of 1975 is the best known, but not the only, example.

The early part of Fraser’s career was driven by anti-communism and his belief that an expansionist Soviet Union represented the main threat to individual liberty. These factors motivated his entry into politics, and later his vigorous support for Australia’s role in the Vietnam War. Yet he was a classic liberal – on the liberal wing of a political party that combined liberal and conservative thinking – and this became clearer in his post-political career, after the fall of the Berlin Wall and the collapse of the Soviet Union.

From the 1990s onwards, Fraser has been associated with causes more commonly seen as left wing, including Aboriginal rights and a compassionate approach to asylum seekers. In 2009, this led him to resign from the Liberal Party, claiming that it had betrayed its liberal ideals. Fraser himself has always claimed that he has not changed – that the concerns that have driven him have always been the classic liberal values of individual liberty and the rule of law. The archival record, from his earliest public statements as a young candidate to the inner workings of his Cabinet, largely supports his contention.

Family and early life

Malcolm Fraser was born on 21 May 1930 during the Great Depression and raised at Balpool-Nyang, a remote property on the Edward River in the NSW Riverina. In later life he attributed his shyness, abrasiveness and social awkwardness to this solitary, although reasonably happy, early childhood.

Balpool-Nyang came into the family as part of the legacy of Fraser’s paternal grandfather, Sir Simon Fraser, to whom the family owed its wealth and social position among the establishment families of the nation. A Canadian Scot, Simon Fraser arrived in Australia in 1853 at the age of 21, and made his money contracting for roads, bridges and railways. He formed the Squatting Investment Company with others, and bought properties all over the west of Queensland and down into New South Wales. Simon Fraser was deeply involved in the politics of the time, first as a member of the Victorian Legislative Assembly and later as a participant in the Australasian Federal Convention of 1897–98. He ran for election to the first Senate and topped the state poll in Victoria. In 1906 he stood for re-election as an anti-socialist. He was knighted in 1918, shortly before his death as a result of bronchitis at the age of 86.2

Less well known is that Malcolm Fraser also had politics on his mother’s side of the family, although this heritage played little part in his awareness. Una Fraser’s father, Louis Arnold Woolf, was born in New Zealand and was at least partly Jewish – the son of a South African émigré. In Australia he married Amy Booth, a third-generation Australian whose grandparents had helped found the town of Milton on the NSW south coast. Una Woolf was raised in Perth, where her father worked as an accountant. In the elections for the first Senate in 1901 Louis Woolf ran as a candidate endorsed by the Australian Free Trade and Liberal Association, one of the many liberal organisations that was a precursor to the modern Liberal Party. He was unsuccessful.3 There is some evidence that Woolf suffered from anti-Semitism, and it seems that his daughter was sensitive to the issue.4 She suppressed the fact of her Jewish heritage, and Malcolm Fraser found out this aspect of his family history only in later life.5
Malcolm Fraser’s father, John Neville (always known as Neville), was born in 1890, the youngest son of Simon Fraser’s second marriage to Anna Bertha Collins, daughter of Queensland pioneer and squatter John Collins. Anna Fraser was also one of the best known and most progressive charity workers of her time. Neville Fraser was educated at Melbourne Grammar, Trinity College at the University of Melbourne, and then Magdalen College, Oxford. He fought in World War I, enlisting with the British, before returning to Australia and the life of a farmer.6

Neville Fraser was involved in local politics in the Riverina, serving on the local shire council at Wakool. Later, after moving to the Western District of Victoria in 1943, Neville Fraser was also involved in clandestine anti-communist movements that were a feature of the time. He did not involve his son in these activities, but Malcolm Fraser shared his father’s deep suspicion and fear of communism. Young Malcolm had a weak chest and nearly died of pneumonia at the age of eight, after which he was sent to Tudor House School in the Southern Highlands of New South Wales, known for its clean air. During this time, Fraser’s parents sold Balpool-Nyang and bought the property at Nareen in the Western District, with which Fraser was identified throughout his prime ministership. The young Fraser was not told until after the sale that the Balpool-Nyang property was on the market. In later life, he described the day he heard about the sale as the worst of his life. He remained at Tudor House between the ages of 10 and 13, and was then educated at Melbourne Grammar before travelling to Oxford, and his father’s old college of Magdalen.

It was at Oxford, Fraser was later to say, where he learned to think. He completed a PPE – a degree in Philosophy, Politics and Economics. His academic results were not notable, but his essays and university notebooks show that he engaged deeply with the works of the classic liberal philosophers.7 He also wrote an enthusiastic piece about the work of John Maynard Keynes, an economist he continued to admire throughout his career. It was also at Oxford that Fraser became aware of the post-war ‘enlightenment’ – the early years of the United Nations, World Bank and International Monetary Fund. He returned to Australia in 1952 determined to do more than succeed his father as the owner and manager of Nareen.

Entry into politics

Malcolm Fraser’s home electorate of Wannon was in 1952 held by Labor. The Liberal Party candidacy was about to be declared vacant. A Fraser family friend, Claude Austin, was a leading member of the local branch of the Liberal Party, and encouraged and coached Fraser to stand for pre-selection. In his speech to the pre-selectors, delivered on 11 November 1953, Fraser declared that anti-communism was his core motivation for wishing to enter politics. He asserted that to counter the working man’s attraction to the ‘false god’ of communism, Liberals must not be Tories nor rely ‘upon a negative’ opposition to socialism, but must engage in:

… a liberal crusade … converts can only be made by the example of their own actions … I want to play some part in this. I am young and would like nothing better than to devote a lifetime to this end.8

To his own surprise, he won pre-selection against more experienced candidates. He went on to contest the 1954 election, in which the Menzies government suffered a small swing against it and lost five seats. He gained a regular spot on the local radio station, and began to give short Sunday night addresses under the title Our Australia. With very few breaks, he was to keep these up until his retirement from Parliament in 1983. The transcripts of the radio talks provide a close insight into the young man’s political thinking, with many of the concerns of his later years also present in these early talks.9
Fraser did not win Wannon in 1954, but the vote was extremely close – only 17 votes separated him from the winning candidate. He won the election of December 1955 with the redistribution of preferences, and subsequently converted Wannon into a safe Liberal seat, winning it at every election he stood for until retiring from Parliament in 1983.

Early parliamentary career

Fraser’s early parliamentary speeches included further advocacy for high levels of immigration, admiration of Keynes, and pleas for western nations to open up trade barriers in the interests of the developing world. If the problems of world trade and global poverty were not solved, the Soviets and communism would take advantage of the resentment in poor nations and freedom would be imperilled, he said. The early speeches also reflect one of the big themes of his later career – faith in the British Commonwealth as a positive influence in the world. Australia, he said, should be a bridge between England and America.

It was in 1959 that the first evidence of Fraser’s abhorrence of racism – one of the abiding concerns of his public career – appeared on the public record in speeches dealing with the future of Papua New Guinea. Fraser spoke again on racism, and against apartheid in South Africa, in the wake of the 1960 Sharpeville massacre. Prime Minister Menzies’ view was that apartheid was an internal matter for South Africa. Fraser thought differently, arguing in his radio addresses and in Parliament that ‘the great principle of human rights, that all men are born equal and have an inalienable right to their place in the sun, no matter what their color, race or creed’ outweighed concerns about interfering in another country’s affairs, and justified international action.

A key event in Fraser’s career was his trip to the United States in May 1964 as the recipient of a grant from the US Government intended to provide foreign parliamentarians with insights into US policy formation. He met and was briefed by the leading political figures of the time. The experience added to his conviction that Australia must play a role in the developing conflict in Vietnam.

Fraser at this time was also involved in the establishment of the Australian Conservation Foundation. Through Claude Austin he had met a group of enthusiasts, chief among them the CSIRO scientist Francis Noble Ratcliffe. Fraser’s main role was to persuade the Treasurer, Harold Holt, to grant the foundation tax exemption.

Ministerial career

It was just over a decade before Fraser left the backbench. When Harold Holt replaced Robert Menzies as Prime Minister, Fraser got his break. He was appointed Minister for the Army in January 1966, not long after the November 1964 re-introduction of conscription, a policy he strongly supported. Fraser’s experience as Minister for the Army, and later Minister for Defence, led him to become disillusioned with the US alliance, in particular the way the superpower treated its Australian ally, often neglecting to inform it of key decisions. However, both as a Minister and Prime Minister, Fraser regarded unity with the United States in the face of the communist threat as essential. Much later, he came to regret the Vietnam War, declaring it a mistake.

A significant Fraser initiative – and one that was to have a big role in later events – was his establishment in April 1967 of the Australian Civil Affairs Unit to provide the South Vietnamese with welfare, building programs and medical assistance. In one of his radio addresses to his electorate, Fraser spoke about ‘the other war … the fight against ignorance, sickness and poverty’, which he said was as real as the casualties on the battlefield. The practical assistance being given by troops to enable the Vietnamese people to improve their standard of living ‘may ultimately be the measure of the success of the Australian commitment’. Four years later, it was Fraser’s commitment to Civic Action that formed the backdrop to the first major crisis of his political career.

Following Holt’s drowning in December 1967, Fraser supported John Gorton for the prime ministership and was rewarded with his first Cabinet post as Minister for Education and Science. The two issues that dominated his time in the portfolio were state aid for independent schools and the growth of tertiary education. In August 1969 Fraser announced that rather than granting aid to independent schools on the basis of need, he would distribute the money across the board, with the grants being determined purely by the numbers of students. Fraser justified this on the basis of classic liberal notions of freedom of choice, although in later life he claimed that concern not to stir up anti-Catholic sectarianism was also a motivation.

A preoccupation of Fraser’s time in this portfolio was promoting the teaching of Asian languages in schools. It was also during this time that he became the first politician to refer to Australia as a ‘multiracial society’ – probably the first time the notion of multiculturalism had been referred to in an Australian parliament. Fraser used the word ‘multiculturalism’ itself later that year in a speech where he argued that love of, and loyalty to, Australia were in no way incompatible with differences in culture and affection for the homeland.

By 1969, Fraser was being written up by some journalists as a future prime minister. Meanwhile Gorton was vulnerable, having almost lost the October 1969 election. The relationship between Gorton and Fraser was strained. They disagreed fundamentally over issues to do with states’ rights, with Fraser believing the states were a necessary check on federal power. One of the controversies that focused these disputes included disagreement over whether the states or the Commonwealth should control the continental shelf. Fraser also believed that Gorton expected uncritical support, which he was not prepared to give him. However, Gorton was re-elected as leader with Fraser’s support after the 1969 election. Fraser was rewarded with the post of Minister for Defence.
By now public support for the Vietnam War had waned and the moratorium marches had begun. The US policy was now ‘Vietnamisation’ of the war. The emphasis was on training and encouraging the Vietnamese to defend themselves, so that the United States could extricate itself. Fraser had the task of trying to recalibrate Australia’s defence policy to meet both the realities of what the United States was doing, and his own understanding of what was needed and what was right. He differed from Gorton in believing that ‘forward defence’ and engagement in the region were essential to Australia’s long-term security interest. Gorton was less inclined to engage with the region on issues of defence, and this led to more disputes and differences with Fraser.

The relationship between the two men broke down in May 1970, after Gorton demanded support from his minister over states’ rights issues. However, the final showdown between the two men came over Civic Action in Vietnam. A cable leaked to an ABC journalist appeared to suggest that the Army was winding up Civic Action without Fraser having been consulted. The result was a confrontation between Lieutenant-General Thomas Daly, Chief of the General Staff, and Fraser. The crisis came over a newspaper article that alleged Daly had told Gorton that Fraser was being disloyal to the Army. Gorton had been given the opportunity to deny the allegation, and had failed to do so. Fraser concluded he had no option but to resign. His resignation speech, on Tuesday 9 March 1971, was one of the most severe pastings ever delivered to an Australian Prime Minister by one of their own side:

> The Prime Minister, because of his unreasoned drive to get his own way, his obstinacy, impetuous and emotional reactions, has imposed strains upon the Liberal Party, the Government and the Public Service. I do not believe he is fit to hold the great office of Prime Minister, and I cannot serve in his Government.

Gorton was finished. The next day he called a Liberal Party meeting and there was a motion of confidence in his leadership. The vote was tied. Gorton resigned. William McMahon was elected the Liberal Party leader and became the new Prime Minister. Fraser had played a decisive role in bringing Gorton down, and made lasting political enemies.

Fraser went to the backbench and used his time to engage in reflection on his core political philosophy. Among other contacts, he met and corresponded with Bob Santamaria, the Catholic activist. He also worked on a new defence policy in collaboration with academics and other thinkers. Fraser made speeches and wrote articles that stand out as statements of liberalism and its expression in the 1970s, including the Alfred Deakin Lecture of July 1971, delivered just five months after he had brought Gorton down, which contains the ‘life wasn’t meant to be easy’ phrase that for the rest of his career many saw as summing up his character and political attitudes. Properly understood, though, the Deakin lecture was a speech about the pragmatic yet idealistic approach demanded by liberalism:

We must be particularly aware of the great weaknesses of man’s idealism which is to forget the frailty of the human race, to believe that man is something that he is not and so construct a view of society that can only exist in the mind. We can only draw reality from our idealism when we can accept that while we strive for perfection, we will not reach it in this world nor our sons after us. Recognition of this truth should soften the radical, bring tolerance to the fanatic, temper the extremes of love and hate. But it will not make our vigilance or struggle any the less necessary.19

One of the most significant products of Fraser’s reflections was a shift in his attitude to China. In his early speeches about Vietnam he had blamed China more than the Soviet Union for provoking and funding insurgency and war. He had seen China as a communist threat equivalent to that posed by the Soviet Union – and not really distinct from it. Now he had a quite different view. He said that Australians should ask themselves how much of China’s policies were motivated by communist ideology, ‘and how much of Chinese policies would be founded in China’s past and often tragic history?’ China had no cause to love any of the great powers, he said, ‘least of all the Soviet Union’.20 In his attitude to China, and in some other things, Fraser was closer to Gough Whitlam and the Labor Party than to his own side of politics, but because he still supported the Vietnam War he was seen as reactionary by both sides of politics.

On 20 August 1971, Fraser once again became Minister for Education and Science. This period saw him make big increases in expenditure for education. Meanwhile, the government was in trouble. Whitlam as Leader of the Opposition was dominating the popular imagination and the Parliament; and Prime Minister McMahon was increasingly a figure of ridicule.

On 2 December 1972, 23 years of Liberal–Country Party rule came to an end with the election of the Whitlam government. Billy Snedden replaced McMahon as Liberal leader. Fraser became Shadow Minister for Primary Industries, then Shadow Minister for Industrial Relations. He was unsuccessful in getting the post he would have preferred – Foreign Affairs.

Over the next two years, as Snedden struggled with the leadership and lost the snap election of 1974, Fraser began jockeying for the position. Following an unsuccessful challenge to Snedden’s leadership in November 1974, on 21 March 1975 Fraser was elected Liberal Party leader by a convincing 37 to 27 votes.

Leader of the Opposition

Although Billy Snedden had already explored the option of blocking supply, Malcolm Fraser said at first he would not be holding the threat of an election over the government. The Senate was ‘primarily a house of review – and apart from exceptional circumstances should not frustrate, certainly not on a purely obstructionist basis’. He left open the possibility that if the government became ‘reprehensible’ the Opposition might have to ‘use whatever power is available to it’.21 After the death of a Labor Senator from Queensland and his replacement by an anti-Labor Senator, the Opposition had the numbers to block supply in the Senate.

The story of his time as Leader of the Opposition is largely about how Fraser came to believe that the government had indeed become so ‘reprehensible’ that the Opposition had a duty to act.

Fraser agreed with much of the Whitlam agenda, but there were parts to which he was implacably opposed. Most important, there was economic management – increases in taxation and a salary and wages policy that, Fraser said, had contributed to what was by early 1975 the highest levels of inflation ever known in Australia. There was runway government spending, squeezing out private investment.
Key to the liberal idea of individual freedom, said Fraser, was the principle that so far as possible people should have a choice over how to spend their income. Free enterprise was inseparable from other kinds of freedom, and Gough Whitlam threatened free enterprise. When Bill Hayden delivered his Budget in August 1975, most commentators in the media were mildly congratulatory. Hayden had acknowledged a need to slow the growth in public expenditure. Fraser was less sanguine. He said in his radio address to his electorate:

… that [Hayden] should win the praise from commentators merely for identifying the problem while still failing to take steps to remedy it is a paradox easily explained by the low esteem in which this government is now held, and the low expectations people have of it.22

Fraser also criticised Whitlam for his lack of compassion towards refugees from Vietnam following the fall of Saigon. With harrowing pictures of the invasion of Saigon filling the evening news, Fraser told his electorate that the Whitlam government had to act. Australia should be prepared to take ‘some thousands of refugees, adults and children’.23

It was the loans affair, in which the Whitlam government sought to borrow vast sums of money for infrastructure development through shady international intermediaries, that triggered Fraser’s decision to block supply, with the final straw being the forced resignation of Minister Rex Connor – the latest in a recent string of ministerial resignations and sackings. Shadow Cabinet made the unanimous decision to block supply on 15 October 1975.24

What followed was one of the most extraordinary periods in Australia’s political history, with Whitlam exploring all avenues to hang on to government, and Fraser holding his senators to the line, although the archival record reveals that several of his colleagues had serious doubts about his tactics and tried to dissuade him from his course. Crucial was Fraser’s reading of the character of Governor-General Sir John Kerr, whom Fraser was convinced, correctly, would act to resolve the crisis. Another critical factor was the strong alliance between Fraser and Doug Anthony, Leader of the National Country Party and a friend since both were elected to Parliament in their twenties.
Kerr sacked the Whitlam government on 11 November 1975, and appointed Fraser as caretaker Prime Minister. An election was announced that day. On the day of the Dismissal an estimated 20,000 people rallied in capital cities. There were strikes in several states, and calls for a general strike. During the crisis leading to the Dismissal, the public opinion polls had shown that most Australians did not support the blocking of supply but, as Fraser had predicted to his colleagues, once the election campaign was called the figures changed. Fraser ran his campaign on economic issues. The election result on 13 December was the worst for Labor in the post-war period. The Coalition had a record majority, and became the first government since the 1961 election to hold a majority in the Senate.

Prime Minister

Malcolm Fraser was Prime Minister from December 1975 to March 1983. He won three elections – in 1975, 1977 and 1980. He took office before Margaret Thatcher became Prime Minister of Britain and before Ronald Reagan became President of the United States. He spanned the years between unquestioning acceptance of big government and the rise of faith in free markets as an organising principle in human affairs. He spanned the years between faith in détente as a means of achieving world peace, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the beginning of the collapse of the Soviet Union. There were immense social changes.

In 1975, conservation of the environment was not a significant issue for the majority. By the time Fraser lost government, it was at the heart of politics. In 1975 the popular press was full of talk of hippies and the permissive society. By 1983 it was power dressing and the beginning of the decade that would become known for the phrase ‘greed is good’. At the time he became Prime Minister, Fraser had been in politics for 20 years, serving under five different leaders of the Liberal Party, and had been a minister in four governments. He had also watched the Whitlam implosion. He had spent a long time thinking about how things should run. Now he put those ideas into practice.

The economy and financial system

With the luxury of hindsight, it is possible to divide the Fraser government’s story into three periods – the early years when the emphasis was on rebuilding the economy after the first oil shock and the Whitlam years; the middle years when Fraser could claim success; and the final years when, beset with crises both political and economic, many of his achievements came undone.
The early months of the Fraser government were dominated by the battle to cut government expenditure. The idea of limiting government’s role owing to limited resources became commonplace over the next 30 years, part of public understanding of what can and cannot be expected from government. In Fraser’s time this was a new theme. Placing economic management at the centre of politics was an important part of Fraser’s legacy.

The Fraser government was the first in the western world after World War II to make the need for government restraint a dominant part of its narrative. Yet Fraser was a Keynesian, convinced of a role for interventionist government. During his time in government, the ideas that later became known as neo-liberalism were gaining their advocates. Fraser’s adviser, David Kemp, was making sure Fraser was aware of them. He read articles by the Australian philosopher Lachlan Chipman and the US economist Milton Friedman, but he was guided chiefly by his understanding of what Keynes would have done in the environment of the 1970s and 1980s. Even as there were swingeing cuts, he initially struggled to retain Medibank – the universal health insurance scheme introduced by Whitlam – although it was gradually dismantled over subsequent years. He introduced family allowances by abolishing tax rebates for dependent children, which had previously benefited the rich the most, and introduced a new allowance paid to mothers.

A characteristic of Fraser’s time in government was a battle with Treasury and its dominant secretary, John Stone. Stone wanted deeper cuts, and there was a continuing battle for policy dominance. It was against Treasury advice that Fraser, acting at the behest of his advisers, took key moves towards financial deregulation. When Treasury opposed the government’s plan to devalue the Australian dollar, Fraser reorganised the department. On 18 November 1976, Treasury was divided into the Department of Finance, under permanent head Bill Cole, and the Department of Treasury, under Sir Frederick Wheeler. Ten days later, on 28 November 1976, Treasurer Phillip Lynch announced devaluation of the dollar by 17 per cent and introduced a flexibly administered exchange rate, or a ‘managed float’.

The years 1979 to 1981 were the high point of the Fraser government’s economic record. In 1980–81, the Budget was in surplus. Industry profitability was recovering. Unemployment dropped to below 6 per cent – the lowest level since the first oil shock of 1973 when OPEC placed an embargo on oil exports, severely impacting on western economies.

At the time of his prime ministership, Fraser was criticised by many for lack of heart and making cuts that were too deep. Since then, some commentators have suggested he did not cut hard enough – that his was a timid, do-nothing government – and he lost the opportunity to shrink the size of government.

Fraser slowed the growth in government spending. Between 1976 and 1982, Federal Budget spending grew by an average of 2.7 per cent a year in real terms. This compared to an average of 11.9 per cent under the Whitlam government, and in the region of 4 per cent under the Holt, Gorton and McMahon governments. If the last year of the Fraser government was excluded – a period when the government faced international downturn and the worst drought in the country’s history until that time – the average growth in government spending during the Fraser years would have been a comparatively modest 2.1
per cent per year.25

Spending by the government as a percentage of GDP was 24.6 per cent in the first year of the Fraser government. It hit a low of 23.9 per cent in 1981–82, before climbing to 26.3 per cent in the context of the drought and recession of 1982–83. During the Howard years, government spending hit a high of 25.7 per cent of GDP in 2000–01. The lowest figure was 23.7 per cent in 1999–2000. When Howard left government in 2007 and the economy was booming, government spending was at 24.2 per cent of GDP. It was predicted to go to 28.6 per cent under Kevin Rudd’s government in 2009–10. While never a hard-line advocate of small government, nor a radical economic reformer, the record shows the Fraser government delivered on its promise to restrain the size of government in proportion to the rest of the economy.

There were failures in the Fraser economic record. Tax indexation was promised, but fell by the wayside.
Wages policy did not succeed. Plans to introduce the rule of law to the industrial realm completely failed. Nobody at the time was pushing for a fully deregulated labour market, and the Fraser record has little or nothing to claim on this issue.

Another key theme of the Fraser government was financial deregulation. Fraser has been depicted as resisting this. The archival record tells a different story. There were four main reforms in the late 1970s and early 1980s. They were the surrendering of controls over the exchange rate, deregulation of interest rates, foreign bank entry, and abolishing exchange control over movements of capital inside and outside Australia. All of these advanced under Fraser. The archival record shows key moves were made on the initiative of key advisers in Fraser’s office and department, and with his support. At every stage, deregulation was resisted by both Treasury and the Reserve Bank. Vital was the establishment of the Campbell Inquiry into the Australian Financial System, which recommended comprehensive deregulation. Implementation of the Campbell recommendations under Fraser was not fast, with work bogged down and moving slowly at the time Fraser lost government. The Campbell agenda was picked up and acted on by the Hawke government that followed. The role of the Fraser government was one of transition and education at a time when the key financial institutions of government had not been convinced of the need for change.26

Human rights and Aboriginal affairs

Under Whitlam, there had been big increases in spending on Aboriginal affairs. There had also been a Royal Commission that recommended the granting of land rights in the Northern Territory. The Whitlam government had introduced, but not yet passed, the necessary legislation. One of Fraser’s achievements as Leader of the Opposition was to help push through a policy that was in line with the Whitlam land rights agenda – an unprecedented move for parties whose support base included the mining and pastoral industries.

In government, Fraser’s continued support for comprehensive land rights saw the Aboriginal Land Rights (Northern Territory) Act became law in December 1976. In the years that followed, the Fraser government used all its powers of influence, example and persuasion to get state governments to follow suit with land rights. New South Wales and South Australia followed. Queensland and Western Australia were intransigent. A states’ rights advocate throughout his career, Fraser was not prepared to over-rule the states.
In later life, Fraser regretted that his government had not done more on Aboriginal affairs. He took the continued poverty, dysfunction and disadvantage in much of Aboriginal Australia as evidence that more government expenditure was needed. He continues his activism on Aboriginal issues to the present day.

For Fraser, Aboriginal affairs were part of a broader human rights agenda, which he shared with Whitlam. The Whitlam government had begun moves towards the establishment of a system of judicial review for administrative decisions, and the setting up of a human rights commission. Both initiatives were brought to completion by the Fraser government. The Administrative Decisions (Judicial Review) Act came into force in October 1980 and the Human Rights Commission was established in 1981. The Fraser government also introduced freedom of information legislation, against the vehement opposition of the public service, in 1982 and completed a Whitlam initiative in the appointment of the first Commonwealth Ombudsman.

Immigration and refugees

The Whitlam government had swept away the last vestiges of the White Australia Policy – but had at the same time greatly reduced immigration. In 1975 Australia’s total immigration was only 52,748, the lowest since World War II. The Fraser government continued an immigration policy that did not discriminate on the grounds of race, and at the same time increased immigration to an average of 90,000 a year over the term of the government. This, together with a compassionate approach to South-East Asian refugees, meant that it was Fraser’s government that actually implemented a more open immigration policy after the White Australia Policy was scrapped by Whitlam. The Fraser government changed the ethnic mix of the Australian population, and its reform of policy concerning both refugees and immigration was arguably its most important legacy. Fraser also continued and gave practical effect to the policy of multiculturalism, which had been started in name under Whitlam.

Fraser, with the exception of a single speech early in his parliamentary career, had always advocated high immigration. By the end of his time as Prime Minister, immigration policy and the relevant machinery of government had been completely recast. The government set up a Population and Immigration Council with a broad membership to write a green paper, which was tabled on 17 March 1977. It estimated that Australia had the capacity to absorb an intake of about 100,000 migrants annually, and up to 200,000 in the future, with the aim of bringing the population to 19.3 million by 2001. The only constraint was the ability of the population to accept migrants, the report said.27

Fraser believed that fostering such acceptance was the role of government and political leaders. The green paper was used to encourage Australians to think and talk about immigration. Seminars were held around the nation. By the time the new immigration policy was announced in mid-1978, it had already been the subject of a government-sponsored national conversation. The policy anticipated an annual intake of at least 70,000, and laid out nine principles governing who would be allowed into the country. Migrants must provide some benefit to Australia, ‘although this will not always be a major consideration in the case of refugees and family members’; they should not jeopardise social cohesiveness and harmony; and while they were expected to integrate they would be ‘given the opportunity to preserve and disseminate their ethnic heritage’. From now on immigration would be planned on a triennial basis with annual reviews and adjustments, and with targets linked to government programs for training and assistance.28
Malcolm Fraser believed that if Australia was to absorb more migrants harmoniously, it was essential that they had real equality of opportunity. ‘If particular groups feel that they and their children are condemned, whether through legal or other arrangements to occupy the worst jobs and housing, to suffer the poorest health and education, then the societies in which they live are embarking on a path that will cost them dearly,’ he said in 1981. Attitudes would harden. Strife would result. Multiculturalism required government action to ensure equality of opportunity, Fraser believed.

The less constructively a society responds to its own diversity the less capable it becomes of doing so. Its reluctance to respond, fuelled by the fear of encouraging division, becomes a self-fulfilling prophesy – the erosion of national cohesion is a result not of the fact of diversity but of its denial and suppression.

It was this agenda that led Fraser to establish a review of post-arrival programs and services for migrants. To head the review Fraser chose Frank Galbally – the former Catholic seminarian and leading barrister. The Galbally review resulted in a comprehensive suite of post-arrival services, including the establishment of the Australian Institute of Multicultural Affairs and the Special Broadcasting Service (SBS) as a specialist broadcaster promoting multiculturalism and reflecting Australia’s diversity.

It was against the background of his belief in the role of political leadership in achieving harmonious migration that Fraser dealt with the influx of refugees from Vietnam and Indochina. Australia was coming under increasing pressure from Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) countries to step up its tardy response to the hundreds of thousands of desperate people in refugee camps across the region. The Fraser government’s response marked the beginning of a dedicated humanitarian program backed by a system of settlement support. Fraser initiated the adoption of a ‘comprehensive and consistent’ policy to allow for a continued intake of refugees, which was adopted in May 1977. For the first time, the policy made it clear that Australia intended to be in the front line of international responses to refugee situations, and that it would take in large numbers. Indeed, it was the first time Australia had a refugee policy at all.

Within months, a trickle of ‘boat people’ arriving from Vietnam had turned into continuous waves. By 1979, Vietnam seemed to be deliberately exporting its unwanted citizens – particularly ethnic Chinese and small businesspeople who were out of sympathy with the communist regime. South-East Asian countries were saying they could not accept any more boat people into the overcrowded camps. Towards the end of 1977 boats were arriving in Australia almost daily – sometimes several a day. The public service was alarmed. In May 1978, the Secretary of the Department of Immigration and Ethnic Affairs, LWB Engeldow, told Cabinet the boat people threatened the orderly refugee program. There were only two options: stopping the boat movements in transit, or sending arrivals to a:

... reception centre to be established somewhere in Australia where they can be held pending further decisions ... these people are ‘queue jumpers’ who are virtually self-selecting themselves for migration to Australia.\(^3\)

Only a small minority of the refugees being settled in Australia had arrived by boat. Most were coming through proper processes, selected in the refugee camps of Thailand and Malaysia. Yet the boats were the focus of publicity and fear.

Suggestions for ‘reception centres’ and other harsh measures came to Cabinet several times, but were always rejected. Entry of refugees (most of whom were not boat people) together with family reunion programs meant that by 1995 there were 238,000 first and second-generation Indochinese living in Australia, more than 1 per cent of the population. The Fraser government had altered the ethnic composition of the Australian population forever. Its reform of policy concerning both refugees and immigration more generally remains one of its most important legacies.

Foreign policy

Fraser came to the prime ministership with firm ideas on foreign affairs. Unlike most western political leaders at the time, he was deeply sceptical about détente with the Soviet Union. This led to Whitlam describing him as a ‘sabre rattler’, and to leading foreign policy advisers seeing him as dangerously antagonistic to the Soviet Union and too critical of the United States’ more conciliatory approach.

Fraser’s foreign policy was articulated in the early months of his prime ministership with a major statement, known to his staff as the ‘State of the world’ speech. The speech, delivered on 1 June 1976, opened a new and original era in Australian foreign affairs. It was controversial – an announcement of Fraser’s arrival on the world stage. A successful Australian foreign policy, said Fraser, must be ‘flexible, alert and undogmatic’, recognising that the superpowers were dominant but also that other major powers – China, Japan, Europe and groups of nations such as ASEAN – could influence events.

‘Although our capacities to advance our interests are limited, we should be active and constructive in pursuit of a peaceful and favourable international environment.’ His wording on détente, much softened from the original draft, was still scathing. Fraser, unlike most foreign policy leaders in the west, believed the Soviet Union was still aggressive and expansionary. China, Fraser said, was on the other hand a ‘great unknown’, but he argued this was all the more reason to seek good relationships. The picture Fraser painted of the world was one of multiple threats – from inequality, injustice and unfairness, from Soviet aggression and lack of will among the democracies. He wanted Australia to:

... be an example of the vital strength of the values of freedom and democracy ... in finding our way in such a world, the democracies must not lose their sense of purpose. There must be no failure of will or resolution ... let history not record that this was the time when the democracies abandoned their faith.\(^3\)

Fraser went on to push Australia to the forefront of world developments where it need not have been involved – including opposition to apartheid in South Africa and advocacy for developing nations. Another dominant theme was Fraser's belief in the Commonwealth of Nations, and his commitment to what he saw as Australia's potentially leading role in the Pacific region. Fraser also made clear that Whitlam’s policy of engagement with China would be continued and strengthened under his government.
Dominant narratives of the time were east–west relations, meaning those between the United States and the Soviet bloc, and north–south relations, meaning those between industrial and developing nations. The developing countries in the United Nations had proposed a New International Economic Order. Unlike the Bretton Woods system, which had benefited the industrial countries, the new order would improve the terms of trade and reduce the tariff barriers that prevented developing countries from fair access to the markets of Europe and the United States.

Fraser’s original contribution was to frame Australia’s interests as the same as those of the developing countries. Like them, Australia was an exporter mainly of commodities, rather than manufactured goods. Like the developing countries, Australia was locked out of world markets. Fraser therefore became a vigorous advocate of free trade – and pursued the agenda hard at every opportunity. On this, he was largely unsuccessful, defeated by the intransigence of Europe and the United States. Nevertheless, the fight absorbed an enormous amount of his time and energy.

Fraser also was a significant figure in promoting a strong and unified western alliance. When the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in 1979, Fraser saw it as vindication of his sceptical attitude to détente. He feared the Soviets would push on into the oil fields of the Middle East. He thought it essential that the west present a united face. He advocated sanctions on trade with the Soviet Union and pushed through a boycott of the Moscow Olympics, at immense cost to his political support and individual cost to the athletes.

Meanwhile, Fraser was involved in shuttle diplomacy between US President Jimmy Carter and European leaders who were annoyed with Carter’s lack of consultation. In letters and in person Fraser argued for unity, convinced that, as he put it in one letter to Carter, the reverse might lead to a world war.
Fraser also had to deal with the complications of foreign affairs in our region, which often left little room for moral comfort. The Indonesian invasion of Timor, which was completed during the period of caretaker government in 1975, was a continuing sore. Fraser regretted the invasion, but took the path of not antagonising Indonesia. He fell out with his Minister for Foreign Affairs, Andrew Peacock, over the Vietnamese invasion of Kampuchea in 1978 and the resulting question of whether Australia should continue to recognise the murderous regime of Pol Pot. Peacock thought the Pol Pot regime so abhorrent that Australia should withdraw its recognition. Fraser and the rest of Cabinet gave priority to supporting the countries of ASEAN, which did not want Australia to give de facto encouragement to the Vietnamese aggression. This led to a cascade of events that culminated in Peacock challenging, unsuccessfully, for the leadership. The government never recovered its stability.

Fraser welcomed Ronald Reagan’s election as President of the United States. Reagan’s views on the Soviet threat were close to Fraser’s own, but Reagan soon disappointed Fraser in other ways. He had no interest in the continuing moves to begin serious world trade negotiations that so preoccupied Fraser.

Perhaps the most singular aspect of Fraser’s foreign policy was his activism in the Commonwealth of Nations. In the 1970s there was the potential for schism between the ‘old Commonwealth’ of white, wealthy nations and the new nations, dominated by African black leaders shrugging off the colonial past. The issue was apartheid and the future of southern Africa. This came to a head at two Commonwealth Heads of Government Meetings – the first in London in 1977, which dealt with sporting boycotts against South Africa, and the second in Lusaka in 1979, which dealt with Rhodesian independence and majority rule. Fraser was an important figure in the negotiations that led to effective sporting sanctions and, over a lengthy period of reasoned argument and strong-arm tactics, in persuading British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, largely against her will, to move Rhodesia towards majority rule. Australia took a leadership position on the issue of justice in southern Africa that was to persist through the years of the Hawke government.

Environment

It was during Fraser’s prime ministership that environmental issues began to take a place at the forefront of Australian politics. Fraser’s record was mixed. He was always reluctant to over-ride state governments pursuing development.
The Fraser government created Kakadu National Park and banned whaling. His actions, including tough negotiations with Queensland Premier Sir Joh Bjelke-Petersen, saved Fraser Island from sand mining and the Great Barrier Reef from oil drilling. Fraser also oversaw the mining and export of Australian uranium, establishing strict safeguards and royalty income for the traditional Indigenous owners.

Yet it is also true that if Fraser had remained in power, it is likely the last great wild river of south-western Tasmania would have been dammed. Fraser did not advocate the Franklin dam and took action to discourage it. He had pushed for the area to be listed on the World Heritage Register, which enabled the Hawke government to later establish its right to over-rule state governments when international obligations were at stake. Fraser offered the Tasmanian Government incentives not to dam the river, but would not over-rule state rights. The resulting battle – not resolved until a High Court decision during the years of the Hawke government – led to the birth of the modern environmental movement and was a factor in, although not the dominant reason for, Fraser’s defeat.

Losing power
Malcolm Fraser lost power after calling an early election in 1983. There were a number of factors – the economy was in poor shape, having been hit hard by the second oil shock which followed the Iranian Revolution in 1979; the drought; and a wave of industrial disputes at home. The country seemed to be at war with itself, and in this Fraser, who had never developed the trick of being loved by the electorate, seemed to be a divisive figure, particularly when contrasted with the former head of the Australian Council of Trade Unions, Bob Hawke, who had entered politics amid enormous popularity and with the reputation of an industrial peacemaker.

Fraser thought he could beat Labor leader Bill Hayden, but he knew that Hawke was a different matter. This was part of the reason he called the election early – but on the same day that Fraser went to see the Governor-General, Hawke was made Labor leader. The campaign began with Fraser 11 per cent behind in the polls, and he was never ahead. His time as Prime Minister came to an end on election night, 5 March 1983.

A month later, he resigned from Parliament. He hoped that by leaving politics, he would make it possible for the Liberal Party to make a fresh start. He had advised leadership rivals John Howard and Andrew Peacock to work together – that the party needed them both. In fact, the Liberal Party was to enter a long period of division and leadership turmoil that would keep it from government until 1996.

Eminent person
Malcolm Fraser was only 52 when he lost power. He was not ready to retire and made a few abortive attempts at a corporate career, before turning to international affairs. He joined the American Enterprise Institute think tank, and was appointed a senior adjunct fellow of the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, DC. Later he became a Menzies scholar at, and a fellow of, the Center for International Affairs at Harvard University. He was also active in the InterAction Council – an international organisation of progressively minded former heads of government. At home, he at first restrained himself from speaking out on politics.

Fraser was at Harvard when, in October 1985, he took a call from Prime Minister Bob Hawke who was attending the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting in Nassau, the Bahamas. Once again there was a schism. Most Commonwealth countries wanted to impose tough sanctions on the racist regime in South Africa. British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher was alone in arguing for a policy of ‘constructive engagement’ with the South African Government. Hawke had brokered a compromise under which a group of eminent persons would seek to begin ‘a process of dialogue across lines of colour, politics and religion with a view to establishing a non-racial and representative government’.32 Fraser became Co-chair of the Eminent Persons Group, with former Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo. Most commentators dismissed this as an impossible mission, yet against the odds the group was able to establish that a peaceful change for South Africa was within grasp.

The Eminent Persons were the first international figures to be allowed to meet imprisoned leader Nelson Mandela, who used them to send a message that he was prepared to negotiate with the South African Government. The group devised a ‘possible negotiating concept’ that they put to both black African leaders and the government. It laid out a map for negotiating the end of apartheid. It was rejected by the South African Government, and the attempt to open negotiations towards an end of apartheid foundered. Nevertheless, the Eminent Persons’ report was influential in shifting international attitudes, not least because it proclaimed Mandela was not the violent terrorist portrayed in South African Government propaganda, but ‘a man who had been driven to armed struggle only with the greatest reluctance’.33

Of the seven countries that had commissioned the Eminent Persons Group, six agreed to adopt broad sanctions, including strict financial ones, but the United Kingdom agreed only to maintain existing bans on new investment and tourism promotions. Thatcher also frustrated attempts within the European Economic Community (EEC) to impose broad-ranging sanctions.

Fraser began a worldwide lobbying effort. In October 1986, partly as a result of his lobbying efforts, the US Congress voted to overturn Reagan’s veto on sanctions. This was the biggest foreign policy defeat of Reagan’s administration. Once the United States had moved, the EEC, Japan and other countries followed suit.

The imposition of sanctions was crucial in persuading the South African Government to begin negotiations – with the starting point being that laid out in the Eminent Persons’ negotiating concept years before. In 1994 Mandela was elected President by an overwhelming majority in South Africa’s first multiracial elections. Fraser undoubtedly played a role in helping to bring about an end to apartheid.

CARE Australia

With his work on South Africa completed, in 1987 Malcolm Fraser began a fresh career as founding Chairman of CARE Australia – the Australian arm of the international aid agency CARE International. He was to be Chair of CARE Australia from 1987 to 2002 – almost twice as long as he had been Prime Minister. For five of these years, between 1990 and 1995, he was also President of CARE International. CARE gave him ‘another life’s work’.34
CARE Australia developed a particular reputation under Fraser for responding to emergencies – a very different kind of operation from the long-term developmental work for which CARE had been known. Fraser toured the CARE operations in the world’s trouble spots frequently, and became closely involved in the sometimes gritty and acrimonious politics of international aid. His youngest daughter, Phoebe, became a CARE worker, and the father and daughter team became the faces of the organisation’s fundraising effort. Under Fraser, CARE Australia achieved rapid growth, quickly becoming one of Australia’s leading aid agencies responding to crises in Africa, Pakistan and Europe.

One of Fraser’s particular contributions was in 1999, following the capture of one Yugoslav and two Australian aid workers in Yugoslavia. They were accused of being spies. Fraser was appointed as the Australian Government’s special envoy. Over five extraordinary months in which he made copious use of his contacts with foreign heads of government, as well as trawling the darker side of the mafia-style network of state-sanctioned criminals that surrounded the Slobodan Milošević regime, Fraser successfully negotiated the men’s release.

Relations with the Liberal Party

Fraser resigned from the Liberal Party shortly after Tony Abbott came to the leadership in late 2009. It was the end result of a gradual process of alienation from the party he had led, chiefly over issues to do with attitudes to asylum seekers and Aboriginal affairs. Fraser had been a critic of the party’s adoption of economic rationalism in the 1990s. He sought the federal presidency of the Liberal Party in the mid-1990s but withdrew when it became clear he could not win.

A major point of strain came when the leader of the right-wing group One Nation, Pauline Hanson, delivered her maiden speech in Parliament which was widely viewed as racist and xenophobic, and Prime Minister John Howard failed to condemn her. In 1997, Fraser wrote to the party president, Tony Staley, urging him to use all his influence to prevent the Liberal Party from directing preferences to One Nation ahead of the Labor Party. He was unsuccessful. Over the next three years, Fraser criticised Howard’s refusal to apologise to the stolen generations of Aboriginal children taken from their parents. Fraser almost resigned from the party during the Tampa crisis of 2001 and the adoption by Howard of off-shore processing of asylum-seeking boat people.

When the conservative Abbott attained the leadership, Fraser took it as the final confirmation that the party would not return to what he saw as true liberalism in his lifetime. He initially kept his resignation private, but the news leaked out shortly after the publication of his memoirs in early 2010.

Present day

Malcolm Fraser lives today on the Mornington Peninsula, Victoria, with his wife Tamie. In his eighties, he remains a regular commentator and activist, particularly on issues to do with asylum seekers, Indigenous affairs and Australian foreign policy.

- The Dismissal, 1975
- Prime Minister, 1975–83
- After office
- Records in personal papers of Robert Menzies, Harold Holt and John Gorton
- Records of Simon Fraser
- Photographs.

Early career

Malcolm Fraser was an Oxford graduate and a grazier when he won the seat of Wannon. Aged 25, he became the youngest member of the 22nd Federal Parliament in 1955. For the next 10 years he was a backbencher in the government of Robert Menzies. He served as a member of the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Foreign Affairs from 1962 to 1966.

This series was raised to deal with the general and policy matters handled by the Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet. Subjects vary considerably, reflecting the department’s coordinating function. Political, social, cultural, economic, industrial and defence matters are all dealt with; other aspects include the administration of the Australian Government, immigration, honours, international conferences and diplomatic relations with other countries.

Australian Conservation Foundation – formation, 1963–65

Fraser was a founding member of the Australian Conservation Foundation.
Minister for the Army, 1966–68

In 1966 Malcolm Fraser became a Minister for the first time when Harold Holt appointed him Minister for the Army. He remained in the position for two years under three prime ministers, Harold Holt, John McEwen and John Gorton. This period was the early stage of Australia’s combat involvement in Vietnam. In his first year as Minister, Fraser visited the Australian troops in Vietnam.

During the Holt government of 1966–67, Cabinet submissions about Army matters were presented by the Minister for Defence, Allen Fairhall. As Minister for the Army, Fraser was not a member of Cabinet, but is likely to have had responsibility for the preparation of submissions and may have been present in the Cabinet room when they were discussed.

Minister for Education and Science, 1968–69 and 1971–72

Malcolm Fraser held the post of Minister for Education and Science on two occasions, the first from 1968 to 1969 under John Gorton. This was a period of expanding departmental responsibilities, with the growth in tertiary education and increased government funding to private schools. When William McMahon succeeded Gorton as Prime Minister, he appointed Fraser Minister for Education and Science in August 1971. Fraser retained the position until 2 December 1972 when the McMahon government lost office.

Prime Minister, 1975–83
Malcolm Fraser was Australia’s 22nd Prime Minister, from 1975 until 1983, when Labor (led by Bob Hawke) gained power. In economic policy, the Fraser government worked to reduce expenditure and provide responsible economic management. Fraser supported strong defence spending, and reinforced Australia’s diplomatic and trade relations with the countries of East and South-East Asia. He had an important influence on the changing relations of countries within the British Commonwealth.

This section begins with a list of records that cover Fraser’s term as Prime Minister, including the key correspondence series of the Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet (A1209) and Cabinet records. Keyword searches within A1209 on the National Archives’ collection database, RecordSearch, are an efficient way of locating material of interest (naa.gov.au).

As well as listing general records from Fraser’s time as Prime Minister, this section includes details of records on the following key issues of the Fraser government:

- Aboriginal affairs
- Apartheid and sport
- Cabinet
- Commonwealth Heads of Government Meetings
- Environment
- Foreign affairs
- Immigration and refugees
- Zimbabwe/Rhodesia.

Cabinet

There were five Fraser ministries (and five cabinets) between 1975 and 1983. The first was the caretaker government formed between the dismissal of the Whitlam government on 11 November 1975 and the swearing in of the new Fraser government on 22 December 1975.

The key Cabinet records of the Fraser government are submissions, decisions and Cabinet Office files (known as LC files). An additional type of Cabinet record – Cabinet papers (later replaced by Cabinet memorandums) – was introduced during the Fraser years.

Related records for the Fraser Cabinet held by the National Archives include the personal collections of Malcolm Fraser, as well as those of key members of his Cabinet (including Doug Anthony, Philip Lynch, Andrew Peacock, John Howard, Ian Macphee and Ian Sinclair).

Detailed information about Cabinet records, including digitised copies of documents, is available on the National Archives’ website (naa.gov.au).

Canberra, 23 March 1976

Submission No. 181 - Prohibition of Cigarette and Cigarette Tobacco Advertising on Television and Radio

Submission No. 185 - Restriction of Cigarette and Cigarette Tobacco Advertising on Television and Radio

The Cabinet:—

(a) re-affirmed that as from 1 September 1976 there will be a ban on the advertising of cigarettes and cigarette tobacco on television and radio;

(b) authorised the preparation of appropriate amending legislation to the Broadcasting and Television Act to ensure the effectiveness of this decision (see paragraphs 17 and 18 of Submission No. 181); and

(c) agreed that the Minister for Health should pursue with the State Health Ministers their proposals to work towards uniform legislation to control cigarette advertising in areas where the Commonwealth has no constitutional power.

Commonwealth Heads of Government Meetings

Fraser attended and hosted Commonwealth Heads of Government Meetings during his term as Prime Minister. He also had an important influence on the changing relations of countries within the British Commonwealth. In August 1979 Fraser attended the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting in Lusaka, Zambia, where his influence was a key factor in the progress towards independence for Zimbabwe. He also hosted a Commonwealth Heads of Government Regional Meeting in Melbourne in 1981.

Photographs

The National Archives holds photographs of Malcolm Fraser relating to his entire parliamentary career – as a backbencher, Minister, Opposition member and Prime Minister – as well as after his time in office. Many were taken by government photographers at formal occasions of state, events and launches, and VIP visits including royalty.

The Department of Information was created in 1947 to promote the Australian lifestyle and events overseas, particularly to intending post-war migrants. In 1950 the agency was renamed the Australian News and Information Bureau, the title under which it was known until 1973 when it became the Australian Information Service. In 1986 it was renamed Promotion Australia and in 1987 it became the Australian Overseas Information Service. In 1994 the Australian Overseas Information Service was renamed the International Public Affairs Branch, a branch of the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade.

Government photographers travelled to all parts of the country to take photographs of everyday Australian life. They include subjects such as people, places, events, festivals, fauna, flora, health, agriculture and industry. The majority of these photographs are now held in the National Archives’ repository in Canberra.

3 Records about Malcolm Fraser in the University of Melbourne Archives

Malcolm Fraser designated the University of Melbourne as the official custodian of his personal papers in 2004. Since that time, the collection has grown to around 120 metres of personal and political records. Fraser’s personal library is now housed in the Malcolm Fraser Room at the University of Melbourne Law School.

The Malcolm Fraser Collection at the University of Melbourne Archives contains a wealth of resources on Fraser’s personal and family history, as well as his political career during and after his parliamentary terms. The records are listed under the following headings:

- Early life
- Early career
- Minister for the Army, Education and Science, and Defence, 1966–71
- Opposition and the Dismissal
- Prime Minister, 1975–83
- After office
- Family papers
- Records in other University of Melbourne Archives collections
- Photographs.

Early life

Malcolm Fraser was born in Toorak, Melbourne, on 21 May 1930. His father, John Neville Fraser, studied law at Oxford University, but on his return to Australia focused on pastoral work. He married Una Woolf in 1926, with whom he had two children, Lorraine (1926– ) and Malcolm. The family lived at Balpool-Nyang in New South Wales before moving to Nareen station in western Victoria in 1943. Malcolm Fraser attended Tudor House School in New South Wales followed by Melbourne Grammar, after which he was admitted to Oxford University (Magdalen College) to study politics, philosophy and economics.

MALCOLM FRASER COLLECTION 2010.0013

Quantity: 9 metres

This series contains material that was originally housed in Fraser’s office and covers a diverse range of subjects, from university notes and documents relating to the Dismissal, to CARE Australia files from the 2000s.

University notes from Oxford, 1950s item 8/1, box 43

Comprises essays on topics such as the Australian labour movement in 1890–93, tariff policies, the French revolution, philosophy and economic organisation.

Early career

After graduating with a degree in philosophy, politics and economics from Oxford University, Malcolm Fraser stood for and won pre-selection as a Liberal candidate for his local seat of Wannon in Victoria on 11 November 1953. He narrowly lost the May 1954 election to the incumbent, Donald McLeod of the Australian Labor Party, but won the December 1955 election by a large margin. In his 11 years as a backbencher, Fraser was outspoken on many fronts, in particular rural issues and the dispute with the Victorian Government over Portland wool sales.

MALCOLM FRASER COLLECTION 2005.0082

Quantity: 0.18 metres

This series consists primarily of notes from Fraser’s time as a student at Oxford University. It also contains drafts of his first pre-selection speech to the Wannon Electorate Convention of the Liberal and Country Party Branch at the Hamilton Temperance Hall.

Includes a statement of Liberal principles in the lead-up to the federal election of 1972 and Fraser’s comments on the statement.
Opposition and the Dismissal

When the Liberal government lost office in December 1972 it was the first time that Malcolm Fraser would experience life in Opposition after 17 years in Parliament. Following the defeat, Fraser was appointed Shadow Minister for Primary Industry, then Shadow Minister for Industrial Relations in August the following year.

The Australian Labor Party won office again in 1974, prompting Fraser to begin outlining his vision of a strong opposition. He challenged successfully for the Liberal leadership in March 1975, defeating Billy Snedden and precipitating one of the most dramatic years in Australian parliamentary politics. The Whitlam government was plagued by a number of scandals, the most prominent being the Loans Affair. In October the Shadow Cabinet decided to block supply in the Senate, attempting to force Gough Whitlam to an early election. This culminated in the dismissal of Whitlam by the Governor-General Sir John Kerr and a subsequent election in December, in which Fraser was elected by a landslide.

Quantity:  0.54 metres
This series contains electorate talks and press releases by Fraser as Member for Wannon, from his time as Minister for Education and Science through to the later years of his prime ministership. Fraser began regular radio talks early and continued them throughout his parliamentary career. He used them to cover many topics, not simply electorate issues, and as such they represent an invaluable source on the development of his political opinion.

Material for radio talks as Member for Wannon, 1973–74  item 7, box 2
Includes the first radio talk as Leader of the Opposition (4 and 5 April 1973). Topics covered include rural reconstruction, the 35-hour week and wage increases under the Labor government.

Radio broadcasts, 1974  item 8, box 2
Contains radio broadcasts and electoral statements.

MALCOLM FRASER COLLECTION  2006.0011
Quantity:  0.53 metres
This series contains material relating to the Whitlam government's proposed legislation to establish an Australian Government Insurance Office and amend the Commonwealth Superannuation Scheme. This Bill was introduced into the House of Representatives in April 1975 but lapsed in August in the Senate. There was considerable pressure from the Liberal Party and other sections of society against the proposal.

Insurance and Whitlam, 27 April – 27 May 1975  item 1, box 1
Includes letters to Fraser from the public and organisations opposing the Whitlam government's insurance changes, and some replies.

MALCOLM FRASER COLLECTION  2006.0012
Quantity:  0.17 metres
This series consists of personal correspondence maintained by Fraser from late 1971 to 1973 mostly as Opposition spokesperson on rural matters.

Correspondence as rural spokesman, 1971–73  item 3, box 1
Includes correspondence between Fraser and representatives of rural organisations, including president of the Australian Farmers' Federation, Mr Hogan, on the establishment of a rural policy committee under Fraser's chairmanship; also contains rural groups' responses to a statement from Fraser about the Whitlam government's proposed protection commission.

MALCOLM FRASER COLLECTION  2006.0014
Quantity:  2 metres
This series consists of subject files maintained by Fraser during his time as Opposition spokesperson on labour matters, mainly covering the period August 1973 to March 1975. Fraser was outspoken in this position, during which time the Liberal Party developed its industrial relations policy. The series also contains files on the Australian Council of Trade Unions and Bob Hawke, the Builders Labourers' Federation and green bans, conciliation and arbitration, and the maritime industry.

Industrial relations, 1974

Includes notes, correspondence and background reports on the Liberal Party's industrial relations platform; also includes correspondence from the managers of BHP and Rio Tinto, as well as Fraser's own notes on the subject.

Includes press statements as Opposition spokesperson on primary industry, labour and immigration.

MALCOLM FRASER COLLECTION

2007.0005

Quantity: 0.26 metres

This series contains correspondence primarily relating to representations from Fraser's constituents, but also members of the broader public. Most of the material dates from Fraser's time as Prime Minister, but there is earlier material. A huge range of topics are covered, including Medibank, housing, Rhodesia, Afghanistan, conservation, land rights, boycott of the Moscow Olympics, and the national anthem and flag. The series reflects public opinion and debates, and contains both the original correspondence and Fraser's reply.

Correspondence 1976V, 19 April – 27 October 1975

Includes correspondence from the public and constituents relating to Vietnamese refugees, especially on the policy of family reunions for Vietnamese students already in Australia; contains correspondence between Fraser and Whitlam on the issue.

2007.0008

Quantity: 1 metre

This series consists of Fraser's speech notes, articles and related papers from early 1972 through to early 1983. The speeches were given to various bodies and cover a wide range of subjects. The files are arranged in chronological order and occasionally contain transcripts of interviews, journal articles and other types of material.

Immigration, 1973–74

Includes speech notes, policy statements and other papers on immigration reforms.

Press speech notes on rural industry, 14 February – 22 April 1974

Liberal Party of Australia – Victorian division, 1976–79

Includes correspondence to Fraser from individual members and branches of the Victorian Division of the Liberal Party.

After office

The Liberal Party lost office in March 1983 to the Australian Labor Party led by Bob Hawke, former President of the Australian Council of Trade Unions. Following the defeat, Malcolm Fraser resigned from the leadership of the Liberal Party and by the end of the month had resigned from Parliament, stating that his continued presence would hinder the ability of the party to regroup under a new leader.

Almost immediately, Fraser became involved in various initiatives on the international stage. In the same year he was appointed distinguished fellow of the American Enterprise Institute and senior adjunct fellow of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. In 1985 Fraser was made Chair of the United Nations Panel of Eminent Persons on the Role of Transnational Corporations in South Africa and Co-chair of the Commonwealth Group of Eminent Persons campaigning for an end to apartheid in South Africa.

In 1987 Fraser founded CARE Australia as part of the international CARE group and was President of CARE International from 1990 to 1995. In 1997 he led a Commonwealth Observer Mission to Pakistan to monitor the national elections.

During the period of the Howard Liberal government (1996–2007), Fraser became increasingly publicly critical of the Liberal Party in office, in particular of its record on human rights, civil liberties, the Iraq war and the treatment of refugees. Fraser left the Liberal Party in late 2009.
This section is divided into the following topics:

- General
- Liberal Party
- South Africa
- CARE Australia.

Family papers

The UMA holds papers relating to Malcolm Fraser’s family. In particular, the collections of John Neville and Una Fraser (Malcolm’s parents) are a rich source of family history. John Neville Fraser was born in Toorak in 1890 to Sir Simon Fraser and his second wife, Anna Bertha Fraser (nee Collins). He was educated at Melbourne Grammar School, the University of Melbourne and Magdalen College, Oxford University. He was a member of King Edward’s Horse Brigade and then the Royal Field Artillery in World War I, serving at the Somme, Ypres and Messines Ridge.

Neville and Una met in 1923 and married in 1926. They had two children, Lorraine (born 1927) and John Malcolm (born 1930). Una Arnold Fraser (nee Woolf) was born to Louis and Amy Woolf in 1902 in Albany, Western Australia, the younger of two daughters. She was active in the Alexandra Club and a benefactor of the National Gallery of Victoria, reflecting her keenness for collecting art.

John Malcolm Fraser as Minister for the Army, interviewed by Captain Murray Taylor, 1967
SO354

Fraser, on a visit to South Vietnam in 1967, speaks of the reasons for Australia’s involvement in the war in South Vietnam and improvements in conditions, particularly in the northern provinces.

Films

Minister visits Army advisers, DPR/TV/413, 1966 F03796
During his visit to Vietnam, Minister for the Army, Malcolm Fraser, inspected elements of the Australian Training Team at Da Nang. He arrived at Da Nang by Caribou aircraft, and after conferring with the Vietnamese Commanding Officer, General Hoang Xuan Lam, boarded a Chinook helicopter. Following a briefing with US senior officers, Fraser visited Australian Army advisers at their centre in suburban Da Nang. He met some of the warrant officers who were advising regional and popular forces in the area, including Noel Stockwell of Puckapunyal, Victoria; Laurie Morrison of Blacktown, New South Wales; and Tom Dolan of Fairfield, New South Wales. Not far from Da Nang, Fraser saw loyal Montagnard tribesmen being trained by Australian Army advisers. After talking to the senior officer, Captain Vin Murphy of Perth, Western Australia, the Minister tried his hand with an M79 grenade launcher before flying back to Saigon.

Format: black and white, silent; duration: 3 minutes, 22 seconds; type: 16mm.

Army Minister visits Kapooka, DPR/TV/345, 1966 F03751
Recruits at the Army’s 1st Recruit Training Battalion at Kapooka, near Wagga Wagga, New South Wales, received two distinguished visitors on 11 February 1966. A visit to the establishment by the new Minister for the Army, Malcolm Fraser, happened to coincide with a visit by Miss Australia, Sue Gallie.

Format: black and white, silent; duration: 3 minutes, 31 seconds; type: 16mm.

Oral history interviews and other sound recordings

The National Library of Australia has a large oral history collection. It is currently undertaking a project with the Museum of Australian Democracy at Old Parliament House to interview a significant number of former parliamentarians. At the time of writing, 58 interviews had been completed and more were under way. A search on the National Library of Australia catalogue for interviews from the ‘Old Parliament House Political and Parliamentary Oral History Project’ will reveal a number of interviews with parliamentarians, party leaders and activists from the Fraser era.
Doug Anthony was a farmer, Country Party (later National Party) MHR for Richmond, New South Wales (1957–84), Minister for the Interior (1964–67), Minister for Primary Industry (1967–71), Minister for Trade and Industry (1971–72), Minister for Overseas Trade and National Resources (1975–77), and Minister for Trade and Resources (1977–83). He was the Leader of the Country Party (later the National Country Party) (1971–84) and Deputy Prime Minister in the Fraser government. In this interview, Anthony speaks about his early life, his years as a young backbencher, his relations with Robert Menzies and his long career as a minister. He refers frequently to Fraser, including his abilities as Opposition leader, the 1975 election, his style as a Cabinet manager and tendency to interfere with the work of other ministers, his relations with Sir John Kerr and National Party ministers after 1975, the influx of Vietnamese refugees, his attitude to the Treasury and economic reform, the new Parliament House and the 1983 election.

Public Record Office Victoria

The Public Record Office Victoria holds correspondence to a variety of Victorian Government agencies sent by Fraser as a private individual, a federal Member of Parliament, a federal Minister and as Prime Minister. These items are dispersed throughout the Public Record Office Victoria collection in the series created by the agencies that received them. They can be located by researchers provided they know when the item was received, it is available on open access and the relevant filing system has been transferred to the Public Record Office Victoria. In most cases researchers will need to consult a controlling series such as a register and/or index to inwards correspondence at Public Record Office Victoria reading rooms. Index headings will vary among agencies.

During Fraser’s term as Prime Minister, a significant quantity of items was sent from his office to the Premier of Victoria. The files of the Premier’s Department (VA 2717) for the period of Fraser’s prime ministership are available for public inspection. The two main series are described below.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE FILES, MULTIPLE NUMBER SYSTEM I VPRS 7614
This series was created by the Premier’s Department between 1972 and 1976. There is an item-specific listing on the Public Record Office Victoria website for the series, but it identifies only file numbers and does not include file titles. To determine file numbers, researchers will need to consult VPRS 7612, 7613, 7614, 9893 or 9894. Refer to the series descriptive entry for further information.

This series was created between 1976 and 1994. The P1 consignment of this series contains files with the primary number 931 (refer to unit 1032 in particular) for Prime Minister and Cabinet, which includes files on a variety of policy issues. The secondary term ‘Commonwealth’ is also used for a number of other primary classifications. Files for this consignment are identified only from a hardcopy listing, which can be consulted in the North Melbourne Reading Room.

Fraser family history

The Fraser family roots in Victoria can be explored using various series in the Public Record Office Victoria collection most frequently used by genealogists. Researchers can refer to the relevant guides on the Public Record Office Victoria website, especially those relating to wills and probates; births, deaths and marriages; and immigration.

A good starting point for family research are the wills and probate files for Malcolm Fraser’s paternal grandfather, Sir Simon Fraser, and father, John Neville Fraser. All wills and probate files at Public Record Office Victoria to 1925 are being progressively digitised.

5 Tamie Fraser

This short biographical essay was written by journalist Margaret Simons who co-authored, with Malcolm Fraser, Malcolm Fraser: the political memoirs published by The Miegunyah Press in 2010.

Tamara Margaret Beggs, known as Tamie or Tam to her family, was born in 1936. She was the eldest child of an established and well-off family of farmers from the Western District of Victoria. On her father's side, the Beggs were descended from Irish free settlers who arrived during the torrent of migration in the 1850s. By the time Tamie was born, they were large landholders. Her mother was the youngest child of an aristocratic Russian émigré father and an Australian mother.

Tamie was brought up at the foot of the Grampians, her childhood skyline dominated by mountains and lake. Her childhood left her with an abiding attachment to country life and a strong sense of duty. ‘In the country everyone is someone. In the city no-one is anyone,’ she would say.1

Within the family she was regarded as the rebel – the one most likely to do unconventional things. Yet she was also notoriously shy and due to the sense of duty instilled by her grandmother and mother, understood this to be a failing that she should overcome. ‘Mum would say, well it’s no use being shy. Shy people are dull. Shy people are boring.’

The tenets of the Beggs’ family values were strong, and clearly and frequently stated. First, one should be loyal to one’s family. Second, one should contribute to one’s community. After that, there was loyalty to one’s country. These were the values that Tamie internalised and which she carried into her highly influential, although often understated, role as a political spouse.

Outwardly, Tamie’s life has been that of the classic supportive spouse, mother and charming Liberal lady. She has been all of these things, but there is more. Her partnership with Malcolm Fraser is one of equals. He valued her advice. Due to his social awkwardness, she was vital in smoothing the way for him. She edited his speeches and articles, and argued with him vigorously when she felt it necessary to do so. Theirs has been a combative, respectful and dynamic relationship. Fraser said of her in his later years that she was stronger than him, and ‘if she had been Prime Minister in 1983, we would have won’.

Tamie was educated first by governesses, then by correspondence, and then sent to board at the Geelong Church of England Girls’ Grammar School, The Hermitage, at the age of nine. Her academic results were creditable rather than excellent, but in every other way her school career marked her out as a leader. She was a school and house prefect, house captain, music captain, sports captain, tennis captain and baseball captain. She won a prize for being the girl who contributed most to the school in work, sport and ‘general leadership’.

Tamie first heard of Malcolm Fraser when she saw his picture in The Sun newspaper in the days following the 1954 election, in which Fraser had contested the seat of Wannon as the surprise candidate for the Liberal Party. At the time the article was published, the election result was not known. It was thought that the 24-year-old might be about to become the youngest member of Federal Parliament. The article, accompanied by a picture of the lanky Fraser leaning against a mantelpiece, described him as an ‘Edmund Hillary look-alike … lean and rugged’ and mentioned the fact that he was neither married nor engaged. Tamie was clearly intrigued enough to read the piece and she remembered it, but she claimed in later life that her initial thoughts were that he must be a fool. Why would anyone want to go into politics so young?

Malcolm and Tamie met face-to-face at a New Year’s Eve party as 1955 turned into 1956, held in a woolshed by neighbours of the Beggs. She was 19 years old, and he was 25. Their engagement was announced in May 1956, and they were married seven months later on 9 December in a tiny weatherboard Anglican church in the town of Willaura, near Tamie’s home. Fraser had promised Tamie that he would not ask her to take part in public life, but the promise was broken almost as soon as they returned from their honeymoon. Fraser lost his voice to laryngitis, which meant that Tamie had to stand in for him at a naturalisation ceremony in the Wimmera town of Edenhope, where refugees from the Soviet crackdown in Hungary were becoming Australians. From that day on, she was intimately involved in public life as Fraser’s partner, sounding board and support.

The first years of their marriage were often lonely for Tamie. The young couple divided their time between a new house on the Fraser family property at Nareen and Canberra, where the young Tamie spent many sad hours in a town that seemed full of ‘grey, bald men’. She spent her 21st birthday, in February 1957, wandering around the Australian War Memorial in tears. Her loneliness was assuaged when the Frasers formed a strong friendship with another young couple fresh to Canberra – the Country Party MP Doug Anthony and his wife Margot. It was an enduring friendship, with the two women giving birth to their first children within days of each other, in 1958. Tamie and Malcolm had four children: Mark (1958), Angela (1959), Hugh (1963) and Phoebe (1966).

By the time Fraser became Minister for the Army in 1966, Tamie, now entering her thirties, had developed a keen political sense. Fraser always consulted widely, and Tamie’s advice did not always hold sway, but she was nearly always one of those he consulted. She supported him in his decision to resign from the Gorton Ministry in 1971 and through the crucial political decisions he made in the supply crisis of 1975, leading up to the dismissal of the Whitlam government. In a letter written on 10 December 1975, in the week before the election that would bring Fraser to the prime ministership with a record majority, former Prime Minister Robert Menzies wrote a personal note to Tamie that reveals both her acumen, the respect she commanded as a campaigner, and the way in which she was used as a conduit to her sometimes aloof and difficult to reach husband:

My very dear Tamie,

May an old campaigner tell you how much he admires what you have been doing in the course of this campaign. You have not only handled your interviews with great charm and skill, but you have been of tremendous assistance to Malcolm. I am now convinced that he will win on Saturday. I would like to convey to him my belief that this will be a great personal triumph, a complete vindication of his character and attainments. I notice that some people have been promoting themselves for future consideration in a rather curious way. Do get Malcolm to believe, as is the truth, that his personal prestige will be so great that he can exercise his choice of Ministers without feeling that he must please anybody but himself.3

The turbulence of 1975 left a mark on Fraser’s family. There were real fears for their security. The children were sent to boarding school because the only option was to have them accompanied each day by body guards. Tamie recalled frequently fearing that her husband would be attacked or shot as he gave speeches.

As wife of the Prime Minister, Tamie felt that more than ever it was her duty to overcome her reluctance to be a public figure. She continued to campaign and take a public role, but perhaps her most enduring contribution in her own right was the founding of the Australiana Fund. On tours overseas, Tamie was struck by the official residences of other countries, and how they were living museums of their country. By comparison, Australia’s official establishments were bare. She founded the Australiana Fund to collect money from the private sector to buy major pieces of Australian furniture, paintings and sculpture for The Lodge, Government House, Kirribilli and Admiralty House in Sydney. The fund survives to this day. The current value of the collection is estimated to be in excess of $4 million.4

Tamie was later to remember the years of the prime ministership as ‘really hard work. I did a lot of stuff on my own account, and then I attended the things with Malcolm as well. So it was full on.’

As well, the couple would ‘thrash things out’ until the small hours. Her counsel was particularly important in those areas where Fraser’s party colleagues were inevitably partisan – the occasions on which a minister was in trouble, and Fraser had to consider whether to ask him to resign. ‘Mine was a layperson’s point of view. I would have to say what message people would take from it if they resigned, or if they didn’t,’ Tamie said later.

To his regret, Fraser did not take Tamie’s advice in 1983, when deciding on an election date. She would have advised waiting, particularly once Bob Hawke replaced Bill Hayden. She saw clearly that her husband could not beat the popular Hawke, but felt that over time he might wear him down in parliamentary debate.

Tamie supported Fraser’s post-political work on the world stage. While they sometimes disagreed on matters of strategy, she instinctively agreed on the core of his political commitment – liberalism, human rights and freedom of the individual.

Nevertheless she counselled him against his unsuccessful attempt to become Secretary General of the Commonwealth of Nations in 1989, and his aborted attempt to become federal president of the Liberal Party in 1993. He was later to admit that she had been right on both occasions. Meanwhile Tamie kept up her charitable work for the Red Cross and in 1992 also became president of the Open Garden Scheme. She regularly opened the gardens at their Nareen home to the public.

In 1998 the couple made the difficult decision to move from the Western District to a property on the Mornington Peninsula. Their new location was a compromise between Malcolm’s preference for a city life (they also owned a flat in South Yarra) and Tamie’s love of rural communities. They were joined on the Peninsula by their daughter, Phoebe, and her family, who lived next door.
From the early 1990s onwards, Tamie and Malcolm’s disenchantment with the political direction of the Liberal Party grew. In 2001, during the Howard government’s Tampa affair, they considered resigning from the party. It was Tamie’s sense of loyalty to friends who shared their views and who were still in politics that helped them make their mutual decision to hang on as members.

In 2004 Tamie was made an Officer of the Order of Australia for service to the community through fostering the recognition and preservation of Australian artistic achievement, for initiating and promoting a range of activities to support people with disabilities, and for support of charitable, health and service groups.

In late 2009, shortly after Tony Abbott became leader of the Liberal Party, Tamie and Malcolm Fraser finally decided to resign from the party. Fraser at first wanted to make their resignation public as a protest against what they saw as the party’s betrayal of its core liberal values. It was Tamie who dissuaded him. To her, the breach with former colleagues and friends was painful and should be a private matter. In deference to her views, Fraser kept the matter confidential until the news leaked out from Liberal Party circles, becoming public in May 2010, shortly after the release of Fraser’s memoirs.

Tamie Fraser continues as an active charity worker for the Red Cross and Stroke Australia. She plays golf regularly, is a keen gardener, an editor of her husband’s articles and speeches, and a crucial influence in her grandchildren's lives.

Appendix 2  Who’s who

Anthony, John Douglas (Doug)

In 1957, Doug Anthony was elected to federal Parliament as the Member for Richmond (New South Wales) at a by-election that followed the death of his father. He retained Richmond at 11 subsequent general elections until his resignation in January 1984. He became Leader of the Country Party (1971–84) on the retirement of Sir John McEwen. The Country Party was renamed the National Party of Australia in October 1982 after a brief period as the National Country Party. Anthony was also Deputy Prime Minister (1971–72 and 1975–83) and acted as Prime Minister on several occasions, particularly during the Fraser government.

National Archives of Australia Commonwealth Person number: CP 55

Barwick, Sir Garfield Edward John

Sir Garfield Barwick was born in 1903. After studying law at the University of Sydney, he was admitted to the NSW Bar in 1927 and became President of the Law Council of Australia from 1952 to 1954. In 1958 he won the federal seat of Parramatta for the Liberal Party, which he held until 1964. During his time in the House of Representatives, he was made Attorney-General (1958–61) and Minister for External Affairs (1961–64). In 1964 he was appointed Chief Justice of the High Court of Australia. He was the first President of the Australian Conservation Foundation and advised then Governor-General Sir John Kerr on the constitutional legality of dismissing Gough Whitlam. He retired from the High Court in 1981 and died in 1997.

Battle, William C

William C Battle was born in 1920 in Virginia in the United States. He received a law degree from the University of Virginia and worked on John F Kennedy’s presidential campaign. He was appointed US Ambassador to Australia in 1962, a post he held for two years. He and his wife were family friends of the Frasers.

Carmody, Sir Alan Thomas

Sir Alan Carmody was head of the Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet from 1976 to 1978, during the Fraser government.

Casey, Lord Richard Gardiner

Lord Casey was Governor-General of Australia (1965–69) during the governments of Robert Menzies, Harold Holt, John McEwen and John Gorton. Casey was a friend of the Fraser family. He was a United Australia Party MHR from 1931 to 1940 (Corio) and a Liberal MHR from 1949 to 1960 (La Trobe). He held portfolios in the Menzies governments during the 1950s, when Fraser was a backbencher.

National Archives of Australia Commonwealth Person number: CP 24

Chipp, Donald (Don) Leslie

Don Chipp was Liberal MHR for Higinbotham (Victoria) from 1960 to 1969, and for Hotham (Victoria) from 1969 until 1977. Chipp was a minister in successive Holt, Gorton and McMahon Liberal Coalition governments. After the dismissal of the Whitlam government in November 1975, he was appointed Minister for Social Security, Minister for Health, and Minister for Repatriation and Compensation in the Fraser caretaker government. Fraser did not appoint him to the Ministry after the December 1975 election, although Chipp later served on several parliamentary committees. In March 1977, Chipp resigned from the Liberal Party and became an Independent member. From May 1977 he was involved in the establishment of a third political party, later known as the Australian Democrats.

National Archives of Australia Commonwealth Person number: CP 121
Cole, Sir Robert William (Bill)
Sir Bill Cole held a number of senior government positions during the Fraser government. He was first Assistant Secretary to the Treasury (1972–76), Australian Statistician (1976), Secretary of the Department of Finance (1976–78), Chairman of the Public Service Board (1978–83) and Secretary of the Department of Defence (1983–86).

Coombs, Herbert (Nugget) Cole
Dr Nugget Coombs was Governor of the Reserve Bank of Australia from January 1960 until his retirement in July 1968. He chaired the Australian Council of Aboriginal Affairs from 1968 to 1976 and headed the 1974–76 Royal Commission into Commonwealth Government Administration, which reported to the Fraser government. He also chaired the Australia Council for the Arts from 1968 to 1974 and the Australian Elizabethan Trust from 1954 to 1968, and held several academic positions. He was Deputy Chairman (later Pro-chancellor) of the Council of the Australian National University between 1952 and 1968, when he became Chancellor, and retired in 1976. He was economic adviser to several prime ministers.

National Archives of Australia Commonwealth Person number: CP 119

Court, Sir Charles Walter Michael
Sir Charles Court was born in England in 1911, emigrating with his parents to Perth when he was six years old. He qualified as an accountant and started his own practice in 1933. He joined the Liberal Party in 1946, and was elected to the state seat of Nedlands in 1953. He held the seat until his son, Richard, succeeded him in 1982, when Sir Charles retired. Court became Western Australian Premier in 1974 and held the position until his retirement in 1982. As Premier he was a fierce proponent of states' rights and an opponent of Aboriginal land rights, leading to tensions with the federal government.

Cowen, Sir Zelman
Sir Zelman Cowen was Australia’s 19th Governor-General, from 1977 to 1982. He was appointed to the position by Fraser after Sir John Kerr resigned in December 1977. Cowen had a long distinguished career in law and academia, holding numerous positions both in Australia and overseas. He was Dean of the Law Faculty at the University of Melbourne (1951–66), Vice-chancellor at the University of New England (1966–70) and the University of Queensland (1970–77), and a visiting professor at various overseas universities. He was regarded as one of the leading constitutional lawyers in the English-speaking world. He was Provost of Oriel College, Oxford University for eight years and active in Jewish community affairs in Melbourne after his vice-regal appointment.

National Archives of Australia Commonwealth Person number: CP 335

Deane, Sir William Patrick
Sir William Deane was born in Melbourne in 1931. He graduated from Arts and Law at the University of Sydney, was appointed to the Bar in 1957 and made Queen's Council in 1966. He was appointed a Justice of the High Court by Fraser in 1982, after serving as a judge of the Federal Court. In 1996 he was sworn in as Governor-General serving until his retirement in 2001. Deane succeeded Fraser as Chair of CARE Australia in 2002.

Eggleton, Anthony (Tony)
Tony Eggleton was born in 1932 and educated at King Alfred's College in the United Kingdom. By 1963, he helped found the National Press Club in Canberra. He was appointed press secretary to Robert Menzies in 1965, and remained in this position under succeeding Liberal prime ministers. Eggleton became Federal Director of the Liberal Party in 1975, a post he held for 15 years. He was the Liberal campaign director for each of Fraser’s federal elections. He resigned in 1990 and took up a post as Secretary-General of CARE International (1991–95) and later Chief Executive of CARE Australia (1995–96).
Garland, Sir Ransley Victor

Sir Ransley Garland was born in 1934 and educated at the University of Western Australia, becoming a chartered accountant in 1958. He was Senior Vice-president of the Liberal and Country League of Western Australia and in 1969 was elected to the federal seat of Curtin, which he held until 1981. Under Fraser, Garland was appointed Minister Assisting the Treasurer and Minister for Post and Telecommunications. He resigned from the latter but was later appointed to a number of ministries, including Veterans’ Affairs, Business and Consumer Affairs, and Special Trade Representations. He resigned from Parliament following the 1980 election.

Garnaut, Ross

Ross Garnaut served the Fraser government as a trade negotiator and in 1980 was Deputy Chair of the first Pacific Economic Conference (now the Asia-Pacific Economic Conference). From 1983 he was an influential economic adviser to Prime Minister Bob Hawke and was Australia’s Ambassador to China from 1985 to 1988. He is Distinguished Professor of Economics at the Australian National University, a professorial fellow at the University of Melbourne, and has held a number of senior government appointments, including chairing Australia’s Climate Change Review in 2008.

Georgiou, Petro

Petro Georgiou was born in 1947 and educated at the University of Melbourne. He was a senior adviser to Fraser from 1975 to 1979, when he was appointed to the Ethnic Television Review Panel and later Director of the Australian Institute of Multicultural Affairs in 1980. In 1994 he won the blue-ribbon Liberal seat of Kooyong (Victoria), which he held until his retirement in 2010. In 2006, as a Member of the House of Representatives, Georgiou crossed the floor to vote against a Liberal Party Bill allowing for the offshore processing of asylum seekers. He is a member of the Malcolm Fraser Collection reference group at the University of Melbourne Archives.

Gorton, Sir John Grey

Sir John Gorton was Australia’s 19th Prime Minister, serving from 1968 to 1971. He was Liberal Party Senator for Victoria from 1950 to 1968, and MHR for Higgins from 1968 to 1975. He appointed Fraser as Minister for Education and Science after the October 1968 election. The following year he appointed Fraser as Minister for Defence. However, after several disagreements, Fraser resigned his portfolio, a move some saw as leading to Gorton’s demise.

Guilfoyle, Dame Margaret Georgina Constance

Dame Margaret Guilfoyle was elected to federal Parliament in 1970 as a Senator for Victoria and retained her seat until retiring from politics before the 1987 election. In the Fraser caretaker government, she was given the Education portfolio (November–December 1975), becoming the first woman to be appointed to Cabinet, and the second woman to serve as a federal Minister. She subsequently held other ministries in the Fraser government.

Hayden, William George (Bill)

Bill Hayden was elected to the House of Representatives in 1961, representing the federal division of Oxley (Queensland). He held the seat for the Australian Labor Party through the next 11 general elections until his resignation in 1988. During the Whitlam government he was Minister for Social Security (1972–75) and Treasurer (June–November 1975). Hayden succeeded Whitlam as Leader of the Australian Labor Party and Leader of the Opposition (1977–83). As a member of the Shadow Ministry during the Fraser government, he was spokesman on defence (1976–83), and defence and economic management (1977). He was replaced by Bob Hawke as leader a few weeks prior to the March 1983 general election, when Labor gained office. In February 1989, Bill Hayden was sworn in as Australia’s 21st Governor-General.

Hawke, Robert James Lee (Bob)
Bob Hawke was Australia's 23rd Prime Minister and the longest-serving Labor Prime Minister (1983–91). He came into office in March 1983 after a landslide election victory, defeating Fraser's government. Before office, Hawke was President of the Australian Council of Trade Unions for nearly 11 years (1969–80), successfully reforming the organisation and increasing its income and membership. He became a member of the National Executive of the Australian Labor Party in 1971 and was President from 1973 to 1978. In October 1980, he was elected to the House of Representatives as the Member for Wills. He immediately became a member of the Opposition Shadow Ministry and spokesman on industrial relations, employment and youth affairs (1980–83). In February 1983, he replaced Bill Hayden as Leader of the Opposition and led the party to victory in the March 1983 election. Under his leadership, Labor won three more elections.

Online resources

National Archives of Australia, Australia’s Prime Ministers (primeministers.naa.gov.au) – this website provides biographical information about Malcolm Fraser before, during and after his term as Prime Minister. It also provides a biography of Tamie Fraser, details of the elections in which Fraser stood for parliament and a link to significant people in his life.

University of Melbourne Archives, The Malcolm Fraser Collection (unimelb.edu.au/malcolmfraser) – this website is a good source of information about Malcolm Fraser. It includes an interactive timeline, links to major legislation enacted by the Fraser government, copies and links to recent speeches and articles, and up-to-date news and events.

National Archives of Australia fact sheets – available online at naa.gov.au and in hardcopy from National Archives reading rooms.
